Observations on the social organization of the little brown bat Myotis lucifugus. Bats are adapted to extreme environments, yet our understanding of how their social organization is influenced by habitat type is poor. We used indirect measurements of social organization, and identified factors that influenced the propensity of group members to associate, including the density of the group, the proportion of social (non-flying) species within the group, and the probability of individuals sharing an established roost. We also examined the relationship between presence and absence of wing loading (as a proxy for body size), the distribution of mature females across age classes, and group size, with the density of the group. As hypothesized, groups were smaller, with a higher probability of forming and maintaining associations, in low-density forested habitat than in closed woodland and heathland. Groups were also larger and less diverse when the proportion of social species in the group was higher. An individual's probability of entering a group was greatest when the group was abundant. There was no significant difference in the mean body size between mature females and juveniles, but an individual's probability of entering a group decreased as the proportion of adults in the group increased.
